A Few Simple Precautions Can Prevent Your Pipes from Freezing this Winter

Both plastic and copper pipes can burst, and the pipes located in unheated spaces, such as your home's crawl space and attic, are the most vulnerable to freezing. Being proactive with the maintenance of your home can save a considerable amount of time, money, and frustration.

Insulation Methods Are Available To Fit a Wide Range of Budgets

There are several ways of accomplishing this task:

- Using insulated tape wrapped over the entire length of the exposed pipe.
- Wrapping with pre-slit pipe foam cut to size and fastened with duct tape.
- Using thermostatically controlled heat cables; be sure to use a product that has been approved by a reputable, independent testing organization such as Underwriters Laboratories Inc. (UL).

No matter which method you choose, the insulation should only be applied to clean pipes.

Insulate both hot and cold water pipes, and be sure to cover all valves and pipe fittings.

Outside Your Home

Other preventive measures include sealing air leaks around pipes, draining outside water lines and shutting off the valve supplying outside water lines.

Inside Your Home

Place fiberglass insulation between the pipes and walls to help keep the pipes warm. When the temperature drops below freezing, open cabinet doors to allow heat to circulate around pipes under sinks and appliances near exterior walls.

The time invested now in protecting your pipes will also pay off in the warmer months because unprotected cold water pipes tend to sweat — encouraging mold growth.
